Canada Watch

By Jocelyn Paquet and Alexandra Ducharme

Despite a slight improvement in the first quarter of 2024, housing in Canada remains at one of its least affordable levels by historical standards. This is due in part to a lack of new housing construction relative to unprecedented population growth. In this regard, the building permit data released this morning was encouraging, as permits jumped 26% on a national level over the month. As today's Hot Chart shows, the details behind this increase were particularly pleasing, as it was driven by a surge in the multi-family segment, which hit a record high in the country (to represent a new all-time peak of 84% of all permits). The regional picture was equally encouraging with three of the four major provinces except Quebec posting gains for the month. In British Columbia, where affordability conditions are far worse than the national average, permits for multi units surged to 86.3K. Multi-family permits also hit a record high in Alberta, where the housing market remains tight as population growth has been particularly acute. While it remains to be seen whether this trend will continue in the coming months and translate into higher levels of housing starts, this morning's data offers a glimmer of hope for the housing crisis.
