

Canada Watch

By Stéfane Marion

While the U.S. economy is operating in a state of excess demand, Canada is grappling with excess capacity. As today's Hot Chart shows, this unusual development supports a significant divergence in monetary policy, now reflected in the widest spreads on 2-year Treasury yields between Canada and the U.S. since the 1997-98 Asian crisis—a key driver of the exchange rate. Without a substantial rebound in commodity prices in the coming months, there is little to support an appreciation of the Canadian dollar against the greenback. Recently, the federal government announced a marked reduction in population growth targets following three consecutive years of record increases. According to the latest targets, population growth is now projected to decline for two consecutive years—a first in modern history. If this unprecedented shift is implemented swiftly, it will likely dampen GDP growth in the coming quarters. This would allow the Bank of Canada to maintain a more divergent monetary policy from the U.S. for a longer period than previously anticipated, especially if shelter cost inflation begins to ease. As a result, we are raising our USD/CAD target from 1.41 to 1.45 this month (see our latest FOREX report for more details).
